About the Program

The Non-Thesis Master’s Program in Private Law is a graduate program designed to provide advanced and specialized knowledge in the principal fields of private law and to strengthen students’ capacity to apply this knowledge within professional practice. Within the framework of the program, courses are offered in areas such as Civil Law, Labor and Social Security Law, Private International Law, Commercial Law, Civil Procedure and Enforcement and Bankruptcy Law, combining theoretical knowledge with practice-oriented perspectives. Through these courses, students are enabled to develop a deeper understanding of the fundamental concepts and institutions of private law, in greater depth, analyze current legal issues, and develop solutions to disputes encountered in professional practice. Rather than requiring the preparation of a master’s thesis, the program emphasizes the development of analytical and professional competencies through coursework and the completion of a term project. Accordingly, the program aims to educate legal professionals who are capable of closely following current developments in private law, effectively integrating theoretical knowledge with practice, and advancing their professional expertise in the field.

Program Educational Objectives

The Non-Thesis Master’s Program in Private Law aims to provide students with advanced theoretical and practice-oriented knowledge in the core disciplines of private law, to enable them to evaluate current legal issues from multiple perspectives, and to enhance their professional competencies. The program seeks to equip students with a comprehensive academic background in the principal fields of private law, including Civil Law, Labour and Social Security Law, Private International Law, Commercial Law, and Civil Procedure and Enforcement and Bankruptcy Law. One of the main objectives of the program is to ensure that students are able to comprehend both classical and contemporary debates in private law, improve their skills in interpreting and evaluating legal norms, and approach legal issues with an analytical, critical, and solution-oriented perspective. In this respect, the program aims for students not only to acquire knowledge of legislation, but also to develop the ability to conduct deeper and more multidimensional analyses by considering judicial decisions, doctrinal views, and comparative legal data together. As a non-thesis program, it particularly focuses on strengthening the knowledge and skills that students will need in professional practice. In this context, the program aims to develop students’ abilities in legal reasoning, problem-solving, interpretation, written and oral expression, and the use of scientific research methods. Through term projects and course work, the program also seeks to equip students with the ability to conduct research on a specific topic, access relevant sources, evaluate information systematically, and present their conclusions in accordance with academic standards. In addition, the program aims to strengthen the advanced legal analysis and evaluation skills that graduates will need in public institutions, the judiciary, administrative bodies, and other professional fields of practice. Accordingly, it is envisaged that students will be trained as competent individuals who are able to relate the theoretical foundations of private law to practice, follow national and international developments, produce solutions to current issues in the field of private law, and use this knowledge effectively in their professional lives.
